AN OPEN LETTER.

From a Well-known Druggist. "Positive" Cure for Stomach Troubles.

To Wm. H. McCorkle, Esq.,

In the summer of 1870 I was first afflicted with that most dreaded disease, dyspepsia, and for over fifteen years I suffered terribly at times. In the meantime I tried every so-called remedy imaginable, without finding relief. Having been in the drug business since 1855, I determined to help myself if I lay in the power of medicine. Two years ago I succeeded in discovering a remedy. It cured me. Until I had given ample time for possibility of doubt, however, I kept my secret almost to myself, putting up the medicine for only a few of my sorely troubled friends, every one of whom was cured. I now know the medicine to be a positive cure, and have decided to put it on the market, that my discovery may do humanity all possible good. It will be known as "Beecher's Positive Dyspepsia, Liver and Kidney Cure," which is guaranteed to cure all ailments of the stomach, liver and kidneys. I have a number of testimonials which afflicted parties may be interested in.

DR. BEECHER'S POSITIVE DYSPEPSIA, LIVER AND KIDNEY CURE. Sold by all druggists. $1.00 a bottle; 12 bottles, $7.50.

MRS. H. B. STOWE.

Life and Life Work of a Great American Authoress.

HOW SHE WROTE "UNCLE TOM."

Birth, Early Life and Surroundings of Harriet Beecher—Marriage and Removal to Cincinnati—Contact with Slavery. Sorrow, Sympathy and Struggle to Help. Success.

On the 14th day of June, 1842, there came into the world a child who was destined to effect more in precipitating a great war, in producing a great moral reform, than all other men and women who for thirty years argued on the subject of African slavery in America.

MRS. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE. It was at Litchfield, Conn., that the little stranger first secured a peep at the world in which she was to accomplish so much; a world in which great wrongs were being perpetrated, a world where human beings were bought and sold as articles of merchandise. Could the wise men of the south have been guided to the chamber where the babe was lying, to see a vision of her future career, doubtless they would have trembled in her presence. But in the plain New England town the event occurred without attracting any attention save in the family of Lyman Beecher, Presbyterian clergyman, and Roxanna Foote, his wife, the father and mother of the little embryo reformer.

In the same month, one year later, another event took place in the same family which was to have an important bearing on the first. A little brother blinked his eyes in the too strong light, and America's most gifted pulpit orator had made his appearance, one day to charm the world with his eloquence and to stand manfully by the cause his sister would so ably advocate.

The mother died when they were very young, but when her place was supplied by Lyman Beecher's taking another wife, and the stepmother arrived at Litchfield to assume the care of his boys and girls, she wrote of Harriet and Henry: "They are always hand in hand." The children were both too young to remember their own mother; indeed, they never had any idea of her face, as no portrait of her was ever made. The stepmother had been, as a girl, a belle in society, a beauty, besides possessing an active mind. She had become religious, and finding the children of her husband comparatively untrained, managed them by a mingling of religious and other instruction in a fashion which brought forth a profound veneration rather than love for a mother. The father, who was one of the noted divines of his day, was an original Abolitionist, consequently a keen sense of the wrongs of the slave was instilled into his children at that sensitive period of childhood when impressions are easiest effected.

Harriet was sent to Guilford, Conn., to be placed under the care of her grandmother, and afterwards her education was continued at the Litchfield academy. At 13 she went to Hartford to attend the school of her elder sister Catherine, where she studied Latin and modern languages, and taught with success a class in "Butler's Analogy." One familiar with that work may well wonder at a child of 14 reading it, much less teaching it to others.

After finishing her course Harriet remained with her sister as teacher till the fall of 1852, when both joined their father, who had been called to the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian church of Cincinnati and the presidency of Lane seminary, an institution for the education of young men for the Presbyterian ministry, and situated at Walnut Hills, a few miles from the city.

At Lane seminary was a knot of original Abolitionists, one of whom was Dr. Beecher himself. There, in 1836, she married Calvin Ellis Stowe, professor of biblical literature.

Lane seminary was an important station on the "Underground railroad." On one occasion Henry Ward Beecher and Professor Stowe, armed like border ruffians, conducted a slave by night to a place of safety. In Mrs. Stowe's family was a servant whose husband was a slave in Kentucky. Mrs. Stowe used to write the wife's letters for her to her husband, and thus gained a knowledge of the man, who deeply interested her in him. He was trusted by his master to come and go to and from the free territory across the Ohio river and had ample opportunity to escape, but always refused to break his pledge not to do so. The high sense of honor of this black produced a deep impression on Mrs. Stowe, and he was destined to become a model for a central figure impersonating the wrongs of his race.

It was Mrs. Stowe's fate to marry a man who was a profound scholar, but somewhat neglectful of material things. She was consequently impelled to help to feed and clothe her children. This she did by opening a school in connection with her sister Catherine and by contributing articles to various newspapers and periodicals. In her school she admitted colored children. One day one of her pupils, a little girl who had never been made free, was pounced upon and carried across the Ohio river. The incident was shocking to the tender nature of Mrs. Stowe. She set about raising the means to buy the child's liberty, and after a time had the satisfaction of setting her free.

In 1850 Professor Stowe removed with his family to Brunswick, Me., where he had been called to a chair in Bowdoin college. Here, surrounded by the same intellectual influences as in Ohio, but farther from the excitement of the border, Mrs. Stowe began the story which was to make her famous.

The fugitive slave law had just been passed. By its provisions a slave holder was not only permitted to hunt his escaped slaves in free territory, but every citizen called on was obliged to join in the chase and help catch the fugitive. By one act of congress the people of the whole northern states were virtually constituted slave catchers, to be called on when occasion required. In the discussions which sprang from the obnoxious act, Mrs. Stowe found a lamentable ignorance and indifference on the part of many of her friends as to the workings of the slave system. Men were stung to the quick at the idea of being personally made slave catchers, but the interference with slavery in those states where it existed was quite another thing.

During this agitation Mrs. Stowe received a letter from the wife of her brother Edward which contained this sentence: "Now, Hattie, if I could wield a pen as you can I would write something that would make this whole nation feel what an accursed thing slavery is." Rising from her chair, after reading the passage aloud to others, Mrs. Stowe exclaimed: "I will write something. I will if I live."

One day Mrs. Stowe was looking over a bound volume of an anti-slavery magazine, edited by Mrs. Dr. Bailey, of Washington, and saw an account of the escape of a slave woman with her child on the ice of the Ohio river from Kentucky.

This incident, so dramatic, so eminently fitted to attract the sympathy of a reader, and narrated by a person who saw the feat accomplished and helped the woman to the shore, became a central point about which the early incidents of the story were to cluster and from which it was to be unfolded.

The escaped woman became Eliza Harris. George Harris was drawn from Lewis G. Clark, an escaped slave. Mrs. Stowe met him and used to keep him for hours in her sitting room questioning him about his escape and his life in slavery. The slave in Kentucky, to whom Mrs. Stowe had written letters for her servant, and whose sense of honor would not permit him to break his parole, became Uncle Tom. Indeed the main dramatic incidents of the book are but the recital of real occurrences to real people.

After writing a few chapters Mrs. Stowe wrote Dr. Bailey, of The National Era, that she was planning a story which might be utilized through several numbers of The Era. In reply she received an application for it, and though in the midst of domestic duties, began to send off installments. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" had been begun both in the writing and the publication.

From June, 1851, to April, 1852, the tale was being published in The Era. It did not attract much attention in this form, but this may have been on account of the limited circulation of The Era. Mrs. Stowe afterwards wrote: "It seemed to me that there was no hope; that nobody would hear; that nobody would read; nobody would pity; that this frightful system which had pursued its victims into the free states might at last threaten them in Canada."

At last the serial was finished, and Mrs. Stowe was the proud possessor of $300 she had received for writing it. Mr. John P. Jewett, a Boston publisher, had noticed it, and offered to publish it. He proposed to pay a half share in the profits if the author would share in the expense of publication, but Professor Stowe regarded this too much of a hazard for people so poor, and a royalty of 10 per cent. was accepted instead.

The result was a great and agreeable disappointment to the author. Ten thousand copies were sold in a few days; and within the first year the number disposed of had reached 300,000. This, with the additional sale of 200,000 copies in the next four years, swelled the aggregate to 500,000 copies in five years. No other work of fiction had ever met with such success in the United States. Besides the sale in America, it was translated into many foreign languages and had an immense sale abroad.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" produced a profound impression among the anti-slavery classes abroad. An address was sent from the women of England to the women of America in care of Mrs. Stowe, and signed by 562,448 women. It is in twenty-six folio volumes, bound in morocco.

A year after the appearance of her book Mrs. Stowe, with her husband and brother, Charles Beecher, visited England. She was received by the very highest of England's titled people and lionized everywhere. At Stafford house, where, after having been introduced to the company by the Duke of Sutherland, having listened to an address by the Earl of Shaftesbury and a reply by her brother, the ladies present moved to one of the magnificent drawing rooms, and the author, seated between the Duchesses of Sutherland and Argyll, conversed freely with her admirers.

PROFESSOR C. E. STOWE. Mrs. Stowe produced some dozen and a half of other works, besides a collection of religious poems. They have all been popular in their day, and are still read; but the one great work of her life was "Uncle Tom's Cabin." On her return from Europe in 1853 she published "Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands;" then "Dred; or, A Tale of the Dismal Swamp," and in 1859 "The Minister's Wooing," a story which has been named as her best effort, considered from a purely literary point of view, though the "Pearl of Orr's Island" vies with it.

Soon after Mrs. Stowe became famous her husband accepted a professorship at Andover. In 1864 he resigned this chair and removed to Hartford, Conn., where he died a few years ago. Mrs. Stowe continued to reside in Hartford after her first removal there, and from there issued a number of her works. In 1869 she published "Old Town Folks," a story of New England life. In 1868 she became co-editor with Donald G. Mitchell (Ik Marvel) of The Hearth and Home in New York.

In 1869 appeared in the September number of The Atlantic Monthly Magazine Mrs. Stowe's paper on "The True Story of Lady Byron's Life," which created such a sensation and worked so seriously to the author's disadvantage. A torrent of criticism fell upon the head of one who till then had received nothing but plaudits from the public. Moved by this she published "Lady Byron Vindicated, a History of the Byron Controversy." Mrs. Stowe was led into this scandal by her great heart getting the better of her judgment. Lady Byron, who was being abused by publications then just issued, made a confidante of the famous authoress. It ended in Mrs. Stowe publishing the story in order to do justice to an injured woman.

Down on the St. Johns river, in Florida, there is a winter home where Mrs. Stowe has been accustomed to go to escape the severity of a northern climate. The place is located seventeen miles above Jacksonville. The house is a frame cottage overlooking the river, and one passage on a boat may catch a glimpse of it through the trees that surround it and the vines that cling about it. Here, in proximity to the palm-trees, the orange groves, the exuberant foliage of tropical Florida and in the midst of the race she did so much to emancipate, Mrs. Stowe passed a number of winters.

The authoress long enjoyed the honors heaped upon her. She achieved a competency from the sale of her books, if, indeed, it may not be considered a fortune, besides a fair income from new sales. In the early days, when she was teaching at Walnut Hills, she knew what it was to be in straitened circumstances, but after the appearance of her first book she not only enjoyed distinction, but affluence.

The decline of the life of the woman who has furnished so rich a treasure in what, for want of a better term, may be called the world's heart-literature has been singularly beautiful. Mrs. Stowe was always fond of flowers, and after her mind began to fail, as stronger things died away, the void was filled by these perfumed objects, fit to enter in and occupy the chambers before taken up with thoughts for the elevation of a downtrodden race. For several years she lived only for her flowers. The summer of 1888 she spent at a farm at North Haven, Long Island. There, always attended by one of her daughters, the white haired authoress would wander about the garden and the orchard, but seldom spoke to any one. It was plain that the mind which had produced so remarkable a work at 38 was broken at 76. While she wandered about among the trees and the flowers the village below was plastered over with an announcement of a grand revival of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

A few years ago Mrs. Stowe's son, the Rev. Charles E. Stowe, became impressed with the importance of his mother giving to the world an autobiography; but her age and ill health did not admit of her undertaking so great a task. Her son therefore got together letters and papers and with the assistance of his brother-in-law, Kirk Munroe, published a biography, which has been lately given to the public.

The heirs of the late Benjamin Thompson, of Durham, N. H., whose bequest of $500,000 to found an agricultural college in New Hampshire, Massachusetts or Michigan, as it may be accepted, was announced a few days ago, have begun a suit to break the will. A conference of the heirs and their counsel was held at Dover recently, and it is understood that the attempt to break the will will be based on eccentricity and impracticable ideas and conditions in regard to the proposed college. The trial will be held at the next September term of the supreme court.
